RESEARCH PROJECTS

Source of funding	Luiss Guido Carli
Name of the research project	Monetary Policy After the Great Crises
Scientific Manager	Prof. Pierpaolo Benigno (ssd. SECS-P/01)
Summary description of the research project	The research under this proposal is motivated by some of the challenges that monetary policymakers are currently facing and aims at providing tools and models that can improve the understanding of monetary phenomena. It is motivated by the recent experience of advanced economies which are plagued by low inflation rates with their central banks that are missing their inflation targets consistently. The first task studies helicopter money and related policies, as ways to reflate the economy. The second task analyzes how monetary policy should be set when non-linearities in the structure of the economy, and preferences, can become relevant. This task points out that disregarding those non-linearities can be a source of a downward bias in inflation, and of a too contractionary policy. Task I under the first part of the proposal studies helicopter money and related policies and is motivated by the persistent low inflation rates experienced by advanced economies during the last decade. The continuous undershooting of the inflation target by many advanced economies has suggested somehow that policymakers are unable to fully control the value of money, having indeed slashed their conventional tool, the nominal interest rate, to zero and having used many unconventional instruments. However, it is odd to think that the central bank cannot control the price level. At the end of the day, the central bank's liabilities exactly define what a currency is. By virtue of this definition, the central bank has the power to print currency at will without facing any constraint. Since the value of a currency in terms of goods is the inverse of the price level, the central bank can really throw from the sky as many currency bills as needed to lower the value of money and reflate the price level. This policy has been labeled helicopter money and has recently received considerable attention in academia and policy circles (see among others Bernanke, 2002 and 2003, Gali, 2020, Tuner 2013, 2016). The state of the art of this task is related to a recent literature that has studied liquidity trap and policy options. Krugman (1998) is the main inspiration for describing a simple model of a slump at the zero-lower bound. Woodford (2000, 2001) is the reference for understanding the special role of the liabilities of the central bank as discussed also in the recent works by Buiter (2014) and Benigno (2020). Auerbach and Obstfeld (2005) and Buiter (2014) study experiments of helicopter drops in various models with different frictions. Along those lines, Gali (2020) compares debt-financed versus money-financed fiscal cuts as

	well as the role of government purchases. Eggertsson and Woodford (2003) and Woodford (2012) stress the importance of forward guidance as an alternative way to reflate the economy out of a liquidity trap. Task II is motivated by a recent literature that has shown that macroeconomic variables like output, inflation and unemployment display some skewness and that business cycles can be asymmetric both in the size and duration of expansions and contractions, e.g. Dupraz et al. (2019) and Salgado et al. (2019). Moreover, central banks around the world are consistently missing their inflation target being inflation constantly below it. This also suggests that there could be some bias in their preferences, non-linearities in the model economy or asymmetries in the shocks hitting the economy. Motivated by these facts, this task studies asymmetries in monetary policy by uncovering non-linear effects behind the standard New-Keynesian model.
